I guess if I traded in for a manual car, the worst case scenario would be that I could have to replace the transmission. If buying a manual car is the way to go, which car should I buy. Thanks in advance for the help! Its not hard, I learned when I was 16. Just have a friend with one teach you, youre not going to break it by grinding the gears once or twice and if you dont get it after that. Alternatively, you could rent one and get insurance on it, then, you know, whatevs. I learned as a Valet and have not owned an automatic car. Find a friend that is patient and make sure you relax. The car is going to buck and jump a couple times. Slow off the clutch and slow on the gas.

You will be ripping through the gear box in no time and day dreaming of nascar driving school. Let us know how the classes go. Why is that Personally, I would hate to drive manual. Youll need someone else to drive you to wherever you need to go to learn. Then, if youre like me and just cant get the hang of it, you're SOL, because now you don't have a driveable car. I used to commute from Marshfield to Boston and back every day in the 95 gig, and with a stick shift, you kinda wanted to kill yourself. Just be warned about that. I like driving a manual it makes driving more fun..almost like a go cart When I bought my first standard, the sales guy taught me how to drive it on the lot, and I drove it home. Not hard to learn, but some situations such as the Boston areas stopandgo traffic, can be challenging for a firsttimer. If you don't want to inflict the first part of your learning curve on your new car, and you don't have a friend willing to let you learn on theirs, try to rent one and get a friend who can drive standard to ride along with you for the day or a few hours anyway and teach you. Why not grab the partner of your dreams and head out to one of the offshore islands, and make a weekend of it I do like the chipin and buy idea, and will take a look at pre96 Saabs, and also see if any of my buddies are willing to go in with me. I could probably find a friend or two willing to let me use their car, but I really just don't want to be put in some weird position if I actually mess up their car however unlikely. Ive driven a stick a few times.kind of funny because it was on a road trip from Boston to Miami with a few friends. Once I could get the car going, I just never stopped until 67 hours later! And im also a naysayer on borrowing someones car to drive. Even if you don't hurt it, if the person is paranoid, all future problems could be blamed on a single incident. Its the same thing as borrowing money from friends.

He was skeptical or saw through me so he watched from the porch as I drove off in his pickup. So instead of stalling it, I completely smoked the tires and peeled out on Main St.I did not stall, but I cut a lot of people off. Anyway, just buy whatever car you want and get lessons from friends. I love driving stick, even in traffic. Which cars would you recommend or avoid if I went the nonshitbox route. I was thinking of just going with another Accord, but definitely open to something else. I had a 58 Benz once with a four speed on the tree instead of the floor, that was fun! We went to a big Industrial Park on a Sunday when nobody was around. This worked out great. Once you get that down find a hill in a quiet neighborhood and learn the balancing act of clutch and gas. Learning how to handle hills was the toughest part for me. Even now if Im on a hill if I see someone pull up behind me, I let myself roll back just a little so they know not to kiss my bumper. Good Luck! Probably not the Tribeca, where its a minivan sort of thing, but any other model should do.Turns out tractors dont really care all that much about balanced clutch action. You just push in the clutch, drop it in gear and then take your foot off the pedal. Then. I accidentally went straight from 1st gear to 3rd gear That was also the day I learned it is possible to pop a wheelie on a tractor. The only thing that kept me from flipping it was the large lawn mower attachment deck on the rear. Have not drove a manual transmission since. But if you took your test in an automatic, you were only licensed to drive automatics. However 95% of cars over there are manual transmission. In fact, I had never even seen an automatic car until I moved over here.

Funny story about renting my first automatic over here, stopping for gas, and not being able to pull the key from the ignition because I didnt know you had to put the car in Park Took me about 20 minutes to figure it out I thought it was broken It took me a while to get good at it, but I ended up having that car for 8 years. Trust me, if anyone couldve ruined the transmission, it wouldve been me when I learned how to drive. But the transmission was fine. Since then, Ive only driven manual cars. Save for gridlock traffic or San Franciscos steep hills, I love manuals. Ask your friends and see who is patient enough to spend a few afternoons with you. Try to go to some business parks or strip malls after hours and stay away from hills until youre ready. Buy said friend lots of booze afterwards because youll likely give the friend major whiplash after all that jerking. Pay taxes and insurance. Register it Try to teach one another to drive. Drink beforehand Give a friend whiplash. I see many pitfalls before you. If I didnt already know and wanted to learn I would try asking a friendly mechanic to teach me for whatever fee you negotiate. If you enjoy it, then buy a manual car that you really like. And now you have a mechanic who knows you and will help you take good care of it. Folks, this is Boston and its still early December if there are, wow, three whole inches of snow on the ground, you wait a couple days and it'll be gone. It won't take weeks to learn to drive the thing. Standards are more fun to drive, cost less on gas mileage, break less, are cheaper to fix. What's not to like? You have to go easy. This is no fun, and takes away a lot of the desirability of driving stick. That said, automatic transmissions belong on Crown Vics and the like, and not a lot else. Manual is more fun, safe, controlled, economical, and fun. Once you've rolled around with that stick in your hands, well.

Because on loose surface, you have the wheels spinning instead of stalling out the engine if you rev the engine too much. The other thing is that different cars have different kinds of clutches. The German cars have heavier clutch action and need more power or weight. Japanese cars, especially the Hondas are very light action clutches. The lighter clutch action on Japanese cars makes them easier to learn on. Manuals are definitely better for icy road conditions, because on icy roads the transmission is another option to slow down the car without the brakes and the tendencies of hard braking vehicles to skid. Then there is also the fact that if your battery or alternator is dead, you can jump start your car just by getting it rolling for a little bit of road and you can pop the clutch and get that sucker started!!! My husband does not know how to drive my car and won't learn which is kind of silly, IMO. I know a car dealer once told me that they teach ppl who buy cars with manual transmission. Very hard to find new cars in this country that are manuals. We have become a very lazy country. It was brand new when I bought it. I'm still on my original clutch, and have never had transmission problems. It took me a few hours to feel comfortable driving, and about three weeks of real world practice in traffic for it to become completely natural feeling. I've also spent two afternoons with my niece in a parking lot teaching her to drive stick. I think that learning to drive manual made me a better driver, and honestly, I never want to go back to automatic. What car you buy is completely a personal decision though, but it is true that driving a stick can be wildly different from car to car. So you need to see what feels comfortable for you.

The friction surface of your clutch is probably worn down to the nub, and while you can still shift gears, I'm willing to bet it would help the life of the tranny hee hee, I said tranny if you had the clutch looked at and possibly get the clutch facing replaced at least.
